The nutritional value of organic foods has been widely disputed. Researchers from Stanford concluded there is limited evidence that organic foods are significantly more nutritious than nonorganic, according to a 2012 review published in the Annals of Internal Medicine. But in 2014 the British Journal of Nutrition published a review of 343 studies that found organic produce on average had significantly higher levels of antioxidants, which help fight disease. Nonorganic foods from the studies were four times more likely than organic foods to have pesticide residue in addition to higher concentrations of a toxic.
