

Happy pair of Conures, one we call Gigi is a green cheek, the other we call Bebe is a Hoffman's Conure, very rare, almost unknown in US captivity, I can find very little information on besides the potential that they have to be a very good pet they are quiet as far as conures ago but in the morning when the Sun rises because they are in our Sun Room they go off with periods of noise throughout the day but nowhere near as bad as other parrots can be, the finches make a happy noise throughout the day also never intrusive, finch eggs has been appearing in the cage/ basket but not for long term(overnight), but we have not provided a nest box, not in a huge hurry to sell, the best possible home is our goal, please inquire and tell about yourself and such, I've put a fair rehoming fee on the whole package and if that is a problem for you, then you're not able to think out into the future as to the costs associated with owning birds, the conures eat a better mix of foods, with a seed mix being only one of the choices and do not struggle with that. The fact that a variety of foods is essential to keeping their appetites may also be part of keeping out of the cage and the owner. They are born with some defense, meaning that if one of your children is with their finger in the cage, they are likely to get a bump.

There are also quite a few other things that can give them a bit more aggressive and desires to romp or me given the chance but he's quite sane when he's outside the cage being held on a stick, he has been on my nudge for period of time without an unfortunate outcomes but at the same time but there have been unfortunate outcomes resulting in a drop or two of blood and yelling.

Hoffmans amp Green cheek Comrie pair, 4 Zebra finches asp, huge flight cage

so this is your reality check before you venture into Psitticine ownership, the finches will happily ditch the cage spending a day or two in the wilds of our sunroom/home before returning back for food & drink, the pair likes being on top of cage, the cage is furnished with natural wild found wood as well as pieces of cardboard plastic paper and such for them to chew and gnaw on they are in need of a nail trim which I hope to provide before you take them home, I've been avoiding doing it due to hearing stories about birds becoming aggressive after their owners clipped their nails, so I was awaiting a time when I could take them to a vet or do it myself without worry about angry repercussions and resentment which they are known to harbor after the "traumatising" session of nail clipping they do like being with people and when we are in the sunroom with them they are at their quietest so not bad birds at all just in need of a new home

Rehoming fee of $600 for birds cages perches &
