"Boots" is a very special guy and we love him so. He was originally adopted by my wife about ten years ago in Chicago at the age of 12 weeks from a local group who rescued and (re)homed alley cats. At the time he was in pretty rough condition with a broken tail, broken nose and severely under-nourished. She took him to a veterinarian clinic where he then got proper treatment including getting fixed, de-clawed and had to have half of his tail amputated. She then brought him home and letterbox trained him and he started his new life of love and happiness.

He is very sweet natured, means well and warmed up to us very quickly. However, he can be a bit high maintenance and could be generalized as "special needs". He can be overly cautious, very skittish, frightful at times and, for lack of a better term, a little scatter-brained at times. Even when he's sleeping or cuddling with us, he can be anxious somewhat and on high-alert. It is because of this behavior, he could have the tendency to be harmful to himself or others at times.

We give him all of the best care, treatment and love that we possibly can each and every day, but we now have a very special three year old boy (which has been challenging in itself) and we have our second baby due just around the corner and are not able to give him all of the attention that he needs and deserves. Plus, with him being so fidgety and easily scared, it can be difficult get him to go where you want him to go when called for which is something needed on a regular basis when there's a newborn in the house.

It is because of all of these reasons that it would be better, kinder and safer for him to be in a caring and loving home with someone who can give him all the affection he deserves. He will most likely be a house with no other cats and definitely not any dogs.
 We are looking for a perfect person for him.
 We love him with all of our hearts and wish we didn't have to do this but a new home for him is the best for everyone and we want nothing a perfect life for him. Please see attached photos of his sweet little face and his silly way of sitting!

Thank you so much for your help, understanding and love.
