I am a Biology and Marketing student at a local college, i have been playing Cello for 10 years as a passionate hobby as well as part time income. I was blessed to learn the majority of my primary (Musical) skills in school programs as foundation before I began paying for professional private lessons. Paying for lessons was by far one of the best things I ever invested in for myself, but only because i really appreciated them and was that much more dedicated because I understood their value towards all of the practice and hard work. I would not have felt comfortable paying for them off the bat with no experience, and it hurts my heart that there are parents going out spending a couple grand on 10 or 15 lessons just for their children to decide its not something they really want to do when they couldve watched some Youtube videos and gotten just as much out of it.

I cannot teach you how to be a professional by textbook definition, but i can teach you how to feel the passion in the instrument and the music in yourself. If you desire, I can get you to the point where your relationship with the cello is so autonomic its a part of you. A couple years ago I walked away from the strictness of classical music. I do not want your childs learning experience to feel stiff or bland.

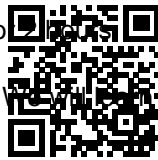

I offer my teaching at bargain to children, teenagers, and adults alike for them to learn the foundation and explore if cello is something they are interested and committed to. After Suzuki book 4 i am not comfortable teaching your student unless they desire an impromptu performer type style, which is what i have mastered within myself. Pricey lessons from a professional, technically trained teacher are more than worth the cost IF you know that its something you will stick with and commit to as well as you know that is how you want to go about your music career/experience. Otherwise, its an expensive waste of time.
