It would be a big blunder to depend upon foodstuff treats to educate your pet - or perhaps a pet of any age. What's incorrect with "biscuit instruction"? It's based on your pup figuring out when he's famished ample to complete what you desire.

Imagine your pet working out of the doorway. You get in touch with him to offer a take care of. But he'd fairly chase a squirrel into the highway than stop to munch a reward. Along with the clear risk of Doggy obtaining strike by way of a motor vehicle, he discovers which he doesn't have to hear you. He learns that he's in command of what he determines to perform and what he decides not to do. Incredibly poor!

Now, I'm not saying you shouldn't give ANY snacks to the pet. Treats is often great motivators. But if your training method consists of giving your puppy a treat when he does what you say....while doing nothing if he DOESN'T do what you say.....then you're going to find yourself in serious trouble whenever you want him to do something and he's not hungry....or whenever you want him to STOP doing something and he'd rather go on doing it, regardless of the treats you're desperately flinging at.
