Fellow Citizens,

Have you noticed that the politicians keep promising change or reform but all they seem to do overall is intensify the wrongs of the status quo? We cannot put in power the same type or elect the same incumbents again and again.

There is a formal plan to prevent us from constantly repeating this situation where we have an entrenched, virtually permanent class of career politicians ruling over us as we do now.

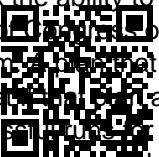

Think about it: Do you want in the future someone who has just been at the White House for eight years as vice president to become president? How long in office were they before that? Was there ever a significant break where they had to live under the regulations they passed like the rest of us? Do you really want someone to serve as a senator for twelve, twenty-four or forty-eight years who becomes a more loyal resident of D.C. as opposed to their own home state? There is not much fear of breaking promises as re-election for them is favored. Must we tolerate the dementia or dying officeholders who have stubbornly reigned uninterrupted for decades?

We lack the ability to call for snap elections for a new government like the parliamentary systems do. Recent surveys have indicated a desire by noticeable proportions to have all our representatives out and vote again. So important there was the desire to a new government, every two years and limited terms, only one or two year term, so that ends the political cumbersomeness that has allowed Congress to refuse to serve for a month or so, as we wanted to have elections every year, and what if the party also had an option to limit the executive term, not for a party machine but by a majority party itself, so that spacing between the number of times a successful person or office holder can maintain a power shiver in the belt would be no longer possible, because there would be a real change of party, parties and independents would have a turn at governing and previous parties would have to actually compete with them to get back to power. Political machines would be put in check and not broken.

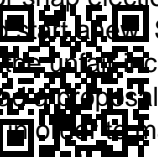

The oligarchs will try to dupe the people against term limits in general by saying it will remove needed experience from governing. Actually limits will create a larger pool of candidates to choose from who have previously held office. This will also inject real world experience into the system. During elections we can concentrate more on passing policy toches as opposed to bults of personality. It is way past due to limit the perpetual ride on the public office carousel by the empowered few so that more of us can have a go.

Here follows a link to such a plan for the federal level. Once you read it you will see by its very structure and by the accompanying arguments how much we really need it. Actually, you will wonder how we have survived so long without it and how its absence has become a threat to us now.

We suggest you download a copy of it for when the powers-that-be decide to censor the internet. Suggest it to any 'States Convention for Amendments' via Article V which is being put forth by various legislatures now. We also advocate similar term limits for other governing bodies.

Your consideration of these efforts is appreciated.
